To whom it may concern,

IEP facilitation and conflict resolution is an issue for all of us that are in the field of special education. Whether we are teachers, campus administrators or program directors, it is very important that we gain the skills as an IEP team member to resolve conflict. I know that the IEP process can be a stressful one and with conflict resolution skills in place, it becomes a much friendlier and understandable process for all involved.

As I began to plan on how to train our IEP teams in our district, I was fortunate enough to have a staff member attend a break out session conducted by Doug and Joyce Little from Key2Ed. This session was a short overview of their Conflict Resolution and IEP Facilitation training that left my staff wanting more. Once I contacted Doug and Joyce to discuss possible training in our district, I knew that we would be in competent hands.

Doug and Joyce provided a three-day Conflict Resolution and IEP Facilitation training in our district that provided an excellent foundation for our IEP teams to build upon and improve their relationships with the IEP team members, improve skills needed for reaching consensus at the IEP meeting, running a better and more time efficient meeting and improving listening skills. The benefit from learning these skills will be very valuable to our district and we have already begun to see improvement in the IEP process even in a short amount of time.

Respectfully,

Kenny Kaye Hudson
